

KEY HEADLINES:

- Equities consolidated on Thursday as the deluge of negative COVID-19 headlines were overshadowed by reports that US regulators will relax the Volcker Rule and allow banks to increase investments into venture capital funds and free up capital that would have otherwise been dedicated to derivatives trades. Risk aversion is in full swing with currencies extending their slide on Thursday after the US reported its single biggest increase in COVID-19 cases ever. Despite the Trump Administration’s attempt to downplay the risk of a second wave, the numbers tell a very different story.
- EURUSD has been charting lower lows and lower highs after peaking at 1.1421 and near a long-term ascending trendline stretched from the 2019 bottom, signaling that the recent bearish wave in the four-hour chart may continue. The weakening RSI, which has crossed below its 50 neutral mark, and the fact that the price has slipped below the middle Bollinger band (20-period simple moving average), is also endorsing the negative view. Yet, whether the bears can dominate may depend on the short-term supportive trendline drawn from May’s troughs.
- Amid the human tragedy and economic recession caused by the COVID-19 pandemic, the recent surge in risk appetite in financial markets has caught analysts’ attention. After sharp declines in February and March, equity markets have rallied back, in some cases to close to their January levels, while credit spreads have narrowed significantly, even for riskier investments. This has created an apparent disconnect between financial markets and economic prospects.
