

KEY HEADLINES:

- Lasting fallout in the US labor market will keep the unemployment rate higher than in peer countries for more than a year, Goldman Sachs economists said in a Tuesday note. The bank expects the US unemployment rate to reach 12% by the end of the year before sliding to 8% alongside Canada by the end of 2021. The UK, Japan, Germany, and Australia will enjoy a far less pronounced labor-market hit, Goldman said, and end next year with their rates well below 8%. The US sits in a joblessness crisis partially stoked by policy side effects, according to the bank.
- The USDCHF currency pair bounced off a major 3-month trendline support at 0.9650 on Tuesday. At the said level, there also lays the regression medium-term trendline of the descending channel starting Apr 24. With the RSI (9) indicating more downside, we can expect a breakout of the 0.9650 level. This is likely to trigger an intermediate decline towards 0.96 and even lower in the medium/long-term. Before breaking the descending channel, however, we could see prices retracing higher. The signal is supported by the short-term RSI (9).
- The European Union has a habit of disappointing when trying to design a joint response to an economic crisis. However, Ursula von der Leyen's speech at the European Parliament on Wednesday about a pandemic recovery fund could well be one for the history books. The Commission president outlined a 750 billion-euro ($825 billion) rescue program to help the bloc cope with the fallout from Covid-19. EU governments still have to agree to the plan, and some northern member states — especially the Netherlands and Austria — are likely opponents.
