

KEY HEADLINES:

- This briefing note summarises what is happening at the election on 3 November, the key issues and what could yet swing the outcome of the vote. We outline the key policy thrusts of the two candidates and conclude with some scenarios and their implications for the economy and markets. We will be publishing an updated scenario analysis together with Oxford Analytica in the upcoming week with a subsequent webinar – invites will be sent soon. Our previous report can be found here.
- China on Wednesday announced that manufacturing activity expanded in the month of September. The official manufacturing Purchasing Manager’s Index (PMI) for the month of September came in at 51.5 as compared to 51.0 in August, according to the National Bureau of Statistics. Analysts polled by Reuters had expected the official manufacturing PMI to come in at 51.2 in September. PMI readings above 50 indicate expansion, while those below that signal contraction. PMI readings are sequential and indicate on-month expansion or contraction.
- August, as you can see, toppled supply from 1.1857/1.1352 and extended space north of long-term trendline resistance (1.6038), arguing additional upside may be on the horizon, targeting trendline resistance (prior support – 1.1641). Trading in September, however, is down more than 1.6 percent, on track to snap a four-month winning streak and retest broken trendline resistance. The primary downtrend (since July 2008) remains intact until 1.2555 is engulfed (Feb 1 high [2018]). Leaving behind support at 1.1553, EUR/USD established a bottom Monday, with strong follow-through buying emerging on Tuesday.
